THE COMMON AGRICULTURAL POLICY

Assist. Prof. Dr. H. Dilara Mumcu Akan[1]

1. Introduction

In 1944, a conference was held in Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, USA. The main goals of Bretton Woods were free commerce, full employment, avoiding unemployment, and achieving currency value stability. The United Kingdom was on one side, led by the Eurocentric world, and the United States was on the other. The eminent economist John Maynard Keynes led the British delegation. Following World War II, Europe was devastated, and countries lost their trained labor force, with hunger being the predominant aspect that the war period provoked in the domains of agriculture and food. To solve all of these challenges, dollars and gold were required. The United States needed to contribute money to Europe through grants and loans to get Europe back on its feet. The US contributed to Europe through grants and loans from a fund named after US Secretary of State George Marshall. It also granted tax breaks to American corporations that invest in the United States. With this aid, European countries improved their status and founded the Common Market in 1957. These improvements were extended to their farmers and staff. The EEC began working on establishing a Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) to ensure food sufficiency almost immediately after its formation. This strategy is the first to incorporate agriculture policies from EU member states.

The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) is a set of regulations to ensure free competition within the EU while providing full protection from outside forces. The CAP's objectives, as stated in Article 39 of the Treaty of Rome, include increasing productivity, improving agricultural sector welfare, ensuring market stability, securing food supply, and allowing consumers to purchase agricultural products at affordable prices (Molle, 2006: 148).

Orcid: 0000-0002-5698-5748

In today's environment, these aims have changed with time (Inan, 2008: 164). These modifications are as follows: Assuring food security and quality, regulating consumer prices, and contributing to the solution of the hunger problem by ensuring the Union's harmonization with world trade, increasing competitiveness in domestic and foreign markets, providing employment and alternative sources of income in rural areas, ensuring stable incomes for those working in the agricultural sector, uniting agricultural markets, and expanding agricultural trade for the Union. The following conditions for achieving these goals in today's environment: The unfettered flow of agricultural products between Member States without restrictions such as customs tariffs and quotas is defined as the Single Market. While the Community enjoys free mobility within itself, it is safeguarded against non-member countries through a variety of procedures and safeguards. Members are given preference in trading agricultural products produced in Community member nations to protect third countries. Financial Solidarity envisions covering the costs of common agricultural policy within the context of a common budget produced with the participation of all members. Rural Development Policies are intended to assist the agriculture sector. This policy has several goals. It entails improving rural infrastructure, promoting rural competitiveness, and safeguarding the environment and cultural heritage (Bauer, 2006: 250-251). Even though it is not their responsibility, Member States are required to bear the financial burden of measures connected to the operation of the Common Agricultural Policy. In this regard, the Community's Fund for Agricultural Guarantees and Guidance (FEOGA) is an essential financial vehicle. Another goal of this fund is to bridge the agricultural structure gap between old and new members of the Community. The goal of the retrospective portion of our study of the Common Agricultural Policy is not to write its history but to better understand the present and recent developments with the reforms made by linking the policies implemented today with the past, as well as to have an idea of potential future problems related to this issue and be able to discuss them. The Common Agricultural Policy will be analyzed under many themes in this study. These will include the operation, tools, financing, reforms and the Green Deal.

2. Implementation of the Common Agricultural Policy

In practically all agricultural-related decisions made under the CAP, the EU Commission has authority. These authorities include pricing and market mechanism determination, market oversight, and formulating draft agricultural laws. The EU Council of Ministers decides on the amount and content of mandatory CAP expenditures. The European Parliament is consulted before legislation is passed, but its influence over the CAP is limited (European Commission, 2004). The EU Commission is in charge of managing the day-to-day operation of the CAP, which it conducts with the assistance of administrative committees.

2.1. Instruments of the Common Market Order

As a result of the founding of the EEC, an agreement known as the Common Market Regulations (CMR) was formed to assure unity in customs taxes, production subsidies, and market intervention measures that differed among member nations. The CMR's function includes the arrangements made during the transfer of agricultural products from farmers to consumers within the scope of CAP principles. The CMR strives to ensure acceptable remuneration levels for producers, stabilize agricultural markets, and defend member nations' agricultural products against third countries (Özçelik & Tuncer, 2008: 101).

The target and intervention prices are the two essential foundations of pricing policy in the EU. The target price is the price that the Community wants producers to receive. This ceiling price indicates that every possibility is used to give the producer the best price. The intervention price is the lowest price for farmers to sell their produce within the EU. This intervention is meant to safeguard farmers from poor prices. This keeps farmers' income from falling below a specific threshold. When the prices of the CMR-covered products fall below the intervention pricing, intervention organizations step in and make purchases.

The CMR includes "olive oil, rice, field crops, cereals, oilseeds, protein crops, sugar, beef, sheep-goat meat, poultry meat, pork, eggs, wine, milk, and dairy products, processed fruits and vegetables, dried feeds, hops, cotton, flax, hemp, and tobacco" (Aysu, 2006: 49). Since the Community's inception, the number of products subject to the Common Market Order has steadily increased.

All common market systems are generally built on a common pricing mechanism. This system is sustained through internal market support and external market protection methods. The protection measures employed differ from one product to the next. When production levels, employment rates, and their shares in the EU budget are considered, the most important common market programs are those for cereals, rice, beef and calves, milk, and dairy products. Common market plans can be divided into three categories (Can, 2005: 49):

- Domestic Market Protection Schemes: Under this system, which varies depending on the product, product prices are restricted from falling below a specific threshold. Intervention purchases are under consideration in the grains, milk and dairy products, and meat industries. Import tariffs or export refunds are used to safeguard the domestic market against low-priced imported items (IKV, 2008: 7).

- Anti-Foreign-Competition Schemes: Tariffs are imposed on low-cost foreign items, and extra taxes are levied if prices fall below a specific level. This group includes eggs and poultry meat, excellent wines, flowers, and fresh vegetables and fruits. There is no price guarantee on these items. External protection is exhibited in imports through reference prices and differential duties (Karluk, 2002: 208).

- Schemes that provide direct support for specific products: It applies to products for which foreign protection is not permitted under the GATT Agreement on Agriculture conditions. Aids offered to farmers for items that account for 1% of total agricultural production but demand specialized and are the sole source of income in some locations are also included under this category.

2.1.1. Price and Market Mechanisms

Market and price strategies are the most complex and expensive intervention areas of the Common Agricultural Policy. Since 1962, target and intervention prices for the items covered by the Common Market Regulations have been established in order to prevent a drop in agricultural product prices and, as a result, a loss in producer income levels. Two mechanisms are used based on this pricing (DPT, 2000: 127).

- Preventing the selling of imported items at prices lower than the goal price intended to be established in the Union's internal markets by collecting customs duties and agricultural taxes at the Union border.
- To purchase surplus products in the market if market prices tend to fall below intervention prices.

2.1.2. Common Agricultural Policy Financing

The European Agricultural Guarantee Fund (ATGF- FEOGA) was established on April 4, 1962, by the six founding members of the Community in accordance with Articles 40 and 43 of the Treaty of Rome to ensure that the CAP is carried out within the framework of the principle of financial solidarity. This fund is part of the Community's general budget and is funded by general budget receipts. Customs taxes and, since 1970, the transfer of various percentages of VAT have been its main sources of revenue. The ATGYF was divided into a Guarantee Department and a Direction Department on April 5, 1964.

When the Guarantee Department is employed for domestic market interventions, production and processing aid, premiums, stocking, purchase, and withdrawal aid specified by common market arrangements are financed. The guarantee budget also funds food aid, market mechanisms for regional development programs, income assistance, and subsidies. Crop production, animal production, and other agricultural expenses are among the Guarantee Department's expenditures. Sugar, olive oil, fiber crops, silkworms, fresh and processed fruits and vegetables, wine, tobacco, and other plant products are all eligible for assistance. Subsidies are provided for milk and dairy products, cattle and veal, sheep and pork, poultry meat and eggs, fishery goods, and other animal products.

The proportion of products included in the guarantee budget fluctuates from year to year. The proportional importance of the product in the total agricultural production of the society, its place in nutrition, the intervention and protection rates set in the CAP, whether there is surplus production, and trends in world commerce and market pricing all influence this transformation.

Financing Export Aid: Because of the Community's high support prices, the local market for supported products has been saturated, resulting in an increase in stocks. Export subsidies have become necessary because domestic prices for these products are often higher than world market prices. This accounts for around 40% of ATGYF spending. All poultry and eggs, 77% of pork, 67% of sugar, 64% of cereals, and 50% of beef and milk were used as export premiums from the ATGF guarantee department. However, this ratio is less than 10% for products such as fresh fruits and vegetables, olive oil, tobacco, oil seeds, sheep and goat meat, and wine, which do not have surplus production difficulties. Compensatory Sums: Established to ensure the common price principle is consistent with intra- and extra-community agricultural commerce.

The ATGYF's Direction Division finances joint initiatives to meet the CAP's objectives. The steering section's budget has remained relatively modest compared to the guarantee section's. While the Community has funded all guarantee costs since 1967, Community funding for the steering portion has long been roughly 25%. This department makes use of two types of funding. The Indirect Financing instrument reimburses 25% of the expenditure covered by Member States in conformity with Community standards. Direct Financing provides direct help to the applicant organization with investment projects approved and financed by the Member States, with the rate of aid varying by region. The Community's share is paid after the projects are completed in both cases.

The projects funded by the Orientation Department are classified as Social and Infrastructure Investments (assistance to producer-related investments and young producers, creation, and maintenance of small producer's groups and service units, measures for the development of farming in mountainous areas, training programs in accordance with modern farming requirements, investments in underdeveloped regions, investments in agricultural infrastructure, and investments in agricultural infrastructure and investments in agricultural infrastructure). Since January 2000, most agricultural expenditures from the Guarantee, direct income assistance under market regulation, intervention purchases, storage expenses, and export subsidies have been used to fund these funds. The guarantee component also contributes to the financing of four CAP measures: agri-environmental schemes, afforestation, early retirement, and compensatory payments for disadvantaged areas.

The ATGYF Orientation Facility is one of Europe's four structural funds. It funds financial support, start-up aid for young farmers, and the construction of agricultural processing and marketing facilities in underserved areas of Europe. The steering committee also encourages innovative rural development programs within the community. This includes initiatives to improve the agricultural structure by improving production and marketing circumstances, land parceling, implementing new irrigation projects, investing in silos, cooling facilities, product processing, milk and meat combines, and so on. The Union also supports efforts aimed at sustaining a certain level of economic vitality in mountainous regions with declining populations and unique issues (Günaydın, 2010: 148).

2.1.3. Common Agricultural Policy Instruments

In the EU, agricultural policy instruments are divided into two categories: pricing policies and structural policies. Price policies are regarded as policy instruments that distort markets, whereas structural policies are regarded as policy instruments that do not directly affect markets. Despite World Trade Organization and public opinion pressures, the EU maintained market-distorting price policies until the reform process (Gürlük and Turan, 2013: 57-58).

2.1.3.1. Price Policy Instruments

The CAP's price strategy incorporates a range of internal and external market protection tools. According to the common market order in which they are implemented, the instruments for the internal market are referred to as "Target Price" and "Intervention Price." External market instruments include "Threshold Price" and Export Support (Acar and Bulut, 2010: 152-153). Target Price: All market support mechanisms in the Union are founded on the notion of "target price," which may be referred to differently depending on the product or industry. This price represents the producer's intended income level and serves as a ceiling price (Gürlük and Turan, 2013: 59). To keep market prices of farmers' products at the "target price," an "intervention price" is calculated, and when market prices fall below this level, intervention mechanisms are activated. In other terms, the intervention price is the lowest price at which agricultural products in the EU can be sold. Intervention purchases do not include all products but rather primarily high-quality products (Aysu, 2006: 50). The threshold price is the price at which non-EU products enter the market. The threshold price protects Union members from third-country competition. By preventing import prices from third nations from going below the threshold price, this method ensures that Union products are favored. Import tariffs raise the price of a product coming from outside the Union to the threshold price level for this reason. In accordance with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the EU discontinued the practice of setting threshold prices in 1995 (Çaşın and Özgöker, 2008: 264-265). Finally, export reimbursements are available to help exporters when world market prices are lower than Union prices and to maintain fair competition in global markets. Prelavalation was collected from exporters in the event that world market prices exceeded Union prices, preventing the outflow of Union production. Export refunds and prelavations were revised regularly in response to market changes (IKV, 2008: 7). With the WTO trade agreement, the EU agreed to reduce export subsidies within six years, so it converted variable taxes and fixed prelavations into tariffs (DPT, 2000: 128).

2.1.3.2. Instruments of Structural Policy

The most fundamental feature of structural agricultural policy instruments, and the rationale for their popularity, is that they do not directly alter the operation of the free market in a market-distorting way. One of the structural agricultural policy mechanisms is the payment to producers of income lost owing to empty agricultural land. This device, which was used to ease the budget's funding burden in cases of excess supply of specific items or to prevent excessive declines in agricultural commodity prices, is no longer in use.

Quotas are another approach for reducing the volume of production. A fixed upper limit is established on the amount of production in quotas. Quotas, for example, are imposed on milk sugar and sweeteners. "Rural development" is another strategy implemented using structural agriculture policy instruments. Nowadays, rural development is defined more broadly to include policies such as the preservation of rural heritage and the environment, the encouragement of young farmers, investments in agricultural enterprises, the early retirement of elderly farmers, assistance to rural people who must use forest areas, and the provision of services to rural areas. The EU also employs a variety of assistance tools for candidate countries in order to secure the alignment of their agricultural policies and institutions with those of the Union, as well as rural development. PHARE - Support for the Restructuring of Poland's and Hungary's Economies, ISPA - Structural Instrument for Pre-Accession, SAPARD - Special Pre-Accession Program for Agricultural and Rural Development, CARDS - for Western Balkan Countries - are all available for this purpose. All of these initiatives were amalgamated under the term IPA - Instrument for Pre-Accession Assistance - between 2007 and 2013. The IPA structure is broad, but its budget is more limited than the preceding programs. The IPA program is divided into five sections: (i) Transition support and institution development, (ii) Cross-border collaboration, (iii) Regional Development, (iv) Human Resources Development, and (v) Rural Development.

The fundamental goal of the Rural Development Program (IPARD) is to support projects that will fulfill the interests and goals of the candidate country as it works towards EU membership. Funds are distributed across countries based on their surface area and population.

3. Reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy

The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) is a policy that was formulated in response to the prevailing conditions of the 1950s, which were characterized by food shortages in the aftermath of the Second World War. The partnership under the framework of the Treaty of Rome involves the management of the agricultural policy of the member nations. The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) implemented by the European Union (EU) initially conferred a significant advantage to the agricultural sector inside the Union through the provision of support prices and the implementation of stringent protective measures.

During the 1980s, the implementation of CAP measures effectively addressed the issue of food scarcity. However, subsequent to this period, the Common Agricultural Policy imposed an overwhelming financial strain on the Union. Approximately 66% of the European Union budget is spent on expenses falling under the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). Furthermore, the implementation of these policies has not only resulted in a significant financial burden but has also given rise to the occurrence of excessive product surpluses. Furthermore, Europe is anticipated to experience insufficient consumption as a result of heightened production, leading to the implementation of diverse reform measures. The initial reform was implemented in 1968 with the objective of enhancing production and productivity. The initial reform is commonly referred to as the "Mansholt Plan".

The proposal advocates for the establishment of large-scale firms in lieu of smaller ones, as well as a decrease in the agricultural labor force, resulting in the allocation of some areas of land to remain unused. The suggested proposal can be characterized as an endeavor to modify the production model and land ownership structure inside the European Union, with a discernible inclination towards benefiting prominent landowners. During that period, water-sensitive seeds, sometimes referred to as the green revolution, were incorporated into contemporary agricultural practices involving mechanization and chemical usage. The phrase "Green Revolution" was coined to describe the implementation of contemporary agricultural practices throughout the 1960s and 70s. Subsequently, the integration of biotechnology methods in agriculture led to the designation of this period as the "Second Green Revolution." Given that this model operated independently of farmers, it necessitated the removal of farmers from the equation.

The Mansholt Plan, initially proposed by the European Union, aimed to facilitate the withdrawal of five million farmers and small companies from agricultural production, resulting in the abandonment of five million hectares of land. The implementation of the plan sparked intense deliberation, ultimately resulting in a decrease in the European Union's agricultural workforce from 10 million to 8 million individuals. Among the population of two million farmers, it is worth noting that a portion of them were in their retirement phase, while the remaining individuals were presented with alternative employment prospects, so necessitating their departure from the agricultural sector.

In 1973, the European Union (EU) released its second reform proposal titled "Enhancement of the Common Agricultural Policy." This approach brought about a heightened awareness of the necessity of decreasing the support costs of certain products. Subsequently, in 1975, the European Union implemented strategies aimed at augmenting consumption, as outlined in the study titled "Assessment of the Current Situation of the Common Agricultural Policy." Despite the absence of a substantial rise in consumption, the utilization of wheat as animal feed resulted in supplementary expenses within the framework of dairy consumption assistance.

One of the significant reform measures undertaken by the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) is the implementation of the "Green Paper Project," which commenced in the mid-1980s. The Green Paper Project, established in 1985, seeks to address the issue of overproduction by implementing measures such as reducing agricultural expenditures, enhancing product quality, and promoting savings, rural development, and environmental conservation (Aydın, 2007: 65-66). In order to attain the intended objective of this reform, two approaches were implemented. The initial approach involved reducing productivity through the practice of keeping the land fallow (known as set-aside), adopting extensive production methods, and promoting retirement. Another objective was to enhance collective accountability and implement diverse support initiatives for small-scale farmers who would face negative consequences due to the decline in prices. According to Aysu (2006: 58-59), the implementation of this reform resulted in a decline in the population of small-scale farmers and an expedited process of corporatization within the agricultural sector. However, it is important to note that despite these efforts, the issues at hand were not entirely resolved. A memorandum was presented on December 18, 1985, whereby some concepts were subsequently endorsed. Several key aspects can be identified in the proposed measures. Firstly, the surplus sectors will gradually decrease their production levels by implementing a market-determined price policy. Secondly, the income challenges faced by small farmer families will be addressed in a more effective and systematic manner. Thirdly, rural development will continue to prioritize the maintenance of social equilibrium. Additionally, support will be provided to agricultural activities in environmentally critical areas. Lastly, reforms will be implemented in market regulations to enhance environmental consciousness among farmers.

The Maastricht Treaty, which came into effect in 1992, is often regarded as the most significant reform in the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). The inclusion of the rural development aim in the Treaty of Rome expanded its scope to encompass economic and social development goals. Additionally, this accord established the legal foundation for the rural development strategy. In the same year, another reform known as the MacSharry Reform was implemented. The provision of support to farmers underwent partial modifications, wherein price support was replaced by a range of alternative measures. These included direct aids, payments linked to environmental protection and rural land management, incentives for rural development, and transitional aids. The objective of these measures was to assist farmers in sustaining their existing income levels. Since the onset of the 1990s, there has been a notable transition from price support mechanisms to direct income support policies. Additionally, there has been an increased emphasis on the significance of environmental sustainability and rural development (Varol, 2003: 113). Significant progress has been observed subsequent to the implementation of the Mac Sharry Reform. Initially, notwithstanding the challenges stemming from weather conditions, production was effectively managed. Subsequently, the adaptable management approach implemented inside the market facilitated prompt and flexible responses to market developments. A state of equilibrium was achieved within the grain market, leading to a notable decrease in the quantity of public stocks from 30 million tons in 1993 to 3 million tons in 1996. There has been a notable decrease in the utilization of inputs, including fertilizers and pesticides, within the agricultural industry, resulting in substantial advancements in environmental conservation. The decline in intervention prices has resulted in agricultural prices aligning closely with global prices, so alleviating the financial strain on the European Union budget. The income of farmers inside the European Union experienced a growth rate of 4.5 percent during the period spanning from 1992 to 1996. The budget of the FEOGA's Guarantee Department has achieved a level of control and predictability. The reform implemented in 1992, known as the Mac Sharry reform, was founded upon two fundamental principles, namely market policy and rural development policies (Aysu, 2006: 62-63).

The European Union saw significant changes and developments as a result of various key events. These include the 1992 Mac Sharry Reform, the 1994 Uruguay Round, the implementation of judgments made by the World Trade Organization starting in 1995, and the admission of 10 additional countries to the EU in 2004. These events prompted the Union to embark on new endeavors and initiatives (Eraktan, 2005: 25-26). The European Union implemented significant budget reductions through the implementation of the Agenda 2000 Reform.

The Agenda 2000 Reform, which is grounded on the principle of sustainability, implements various initiatives aimed at ensuring product quality, fostering market competition, promoting rural areas, and adopting a more ecologically conscious attitude. The Special Accession Program in the Field of Agriculture and Rural Development (SAPARD) was implemented with the objective of providing financial assistance to the 10 Central and Eastern European Countries (CEECs) during their accession process to the European Union (EU). A total of 520 million ECU was allocated to support these countries. The European Union has established its agricultural and rural development policy for the long term through the implementation of the Agenda 2000 Reform. The implementation of the previously applicable Common Market Regulations emerged as the primary instrument for attaining these objectives. Consequently, there is a reduction in intervention prices and a corresponding rise in direct income support. This policy shift has been implemented with the intention of preventing the allocation of financial help from the Union budget towards addressing the structural and infrastructural challenges faced by the 10 nations seeking to join the European Union.

In 1999, the final determinations of the Agenda 2000 Reform were made, wherein the reform decisions included a reassessment of the agriculture budget in consideration of market dynamics. In pursuit of this objective, the 2003 reform comprises three constituent elements. The initial element pertains to the "Single Payment Scheme". The implementation of the Single Payment Scheme resulted in the replacement of various subsidies previously enjoyed by farmers (Baş, 2004: 20). Consequently, the practice of associating payments with productivity was terminated. It was hypothesized that by adopting this approach, farmers would be incentivized to pursue profit-driven production, thus alleviating the financial burden associated with the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). Furthermore, the provision of subsidies was contingent upon compliance with the regulations outlined by the European Union pertaining to several domains, such as environmental protection, animal health, and welfare, as well as plant and public health. During the period of reform, Franz Fischler, the European Union Commissioner for Agriculture, expressed that the linkage between Direct Income Support and production would be severed. He further emphasized the objective of stabilizing producers' incomes and promoting consumer-driven production choices.

In 2013, an additional reform initiative was implemented within the framework of the Common Agricultural Policy. The report suggested that greater emphasis should be placed on environmental and climate change concerns in the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). It also recommended aligning with the "green box" payments as outlined in the World Trade Organization agreement. Additionally, the report called for addressing the unequal distribution of agricultural support among member states, restructuring direct payments, and implementing a more efficient rural development strategy (European Commission, 2010: 11-12). The reform package incorporated several modifications to the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) in accordance with the objectives of the Europe 2020 plan. These revisions aimed to attain a suitable level of food production, promote the sustainable utilization of natural resources, and foster balanced regional development. The regulation of direct payments, the implementation of a policy that promotes greater equality and environmental sustainability, and the incorporation of an enhanced safety net and rural development measures have been observed. According to the Eurostat Pocketbooks (2013: 45), a budget of €303.1 billion was designated for the purpose of agricultural and rural development throughout the period of 2014-2020. The 2013 reform, also referred to as the Ciolos reform, is a significant endeavor aimed at establishing an environmentally sustainable agriculture policy. This reform is now under discussion, with a focus on examining the proposed modifications in terms of their objectives and the tools employed (Doğaner, 2021: 25).

4. The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) within the context of the Green New Deal.

The European Green Deal is a pact released by the European Union Commission in late 2019 in response to the climate crisis, with the objective of rendering Europe climate-sensitive and environmentally friendly by 2050 (Özekan, 2023). The European Union's "Farm to Fork" and Biodiversity Strategies, integral components of the European Green Deal, outline the EU's goals pertaining to agriculture, food, and biodiversity. These strategies emphasize the pressing necessity to diminish dependence on pesticides, antimicrobials, and excessive fertilization. Additionally, they advocate for expanding the extent of organic farming, enhancing animal welfare, and reversing the decline in biodiversity. All the while, the objective of establishing a sturdy and adaptable food system that caters to all situations and guarantees citizens' access to sufficient and suitable food remains paramount.

European farmers and fishers play a crucial role in this process. The implementation of the farm-to-table approach is anticipated to enhance the endeavors of agriculturalists and fishers in their fight against climate change, as well as their commitment to safeguarding the environment and preserving biodiversity. The continued implementation of the Common Agricultural and Common Fisheries Policies remains crucial in providing support for these endeavors while simultaneously safeguarding a satisfactory quality of life for farmers, fishers, and their respective families.

The proposed Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) measures for the period 2021-2027 put out by the Commission outline that a minimum of 40% of the overall budget allocated to the CAP and a minimum of 30% of the Maritime and Fisheries Fund would be directed towards initiatives aimed at addressing climate change. The adoption of sustainable practices in precision agriculture, organic farming, agro-ecology, agro-forestry, and animal protection will be pursued.

Farmers must get incentives for their effective environmental and climate practices, which may include eco-labeling, carbon sequestration in soils, enhancement of water quality, and nutrient management to mitigate emissions. The primary objective of the Commission is to actively pursue the advancement of sustainable seafood practices while concurrently minimizing the carbon emissions associated with its production and distribution.

The European Union (EU) has set a target to achieve a minimum of 25% organic farming coverage on agricultural land by the year 2030. Furthermore, the EU is currently in the process of formulating an agri-food promotion policy that aligns with this objective. The agri-food promotion policy aims to enhance the adherence to quality standards inside both the internal market of the European Union and in nations engaged in trade with the EU.

The European Union Commission intends to address an additional concern, namely the implementation of compulsory front-of-pack labeling. The proposed initiative aims to implement a comprehensive system of sustainable food labeling that encompasses various dimensions, including nutritional, climate-related, environmental, and social considerations, in order to provide consumers with a more informed understanding of food products. The implementation of this labeling system will empower customers to make informed decisions regarding their dietary choices, aligning with the overarching "farm to fork" approach.

The European Union (EU) asserts its commitment to engaging in collaboration with other nations and international stakeholders in order to bolster the worldwide endeavor towards establishing sustainable food systems. In pursuit of this objective, a substantial allocation of €10 billion will be dedicated to research and development activities in the domains of food, bio-economy, natural resources, agriculture, fisheries, aquaculture, and environment within the framework of Horizon Europe. The Green Deal also encompasses the mitigation of methane emissions as a key concern. Methane holds the position of being the second most significant greenhouse gas in relation to its influence on climate change, contributing to 10% of the total emissions of greenhouse gases. Agricultural production and the food sector are also the main emitters of methane. Hence, the assessment and disclosure of methane emissions are currently a topic of concern. In contrast, it is underscored that the Commission will actively promote the adoption of biodegradable and plant-derived plastics in various packaging applications by the year 2030. Additionally, the Commission intends to enforce penalties on single-use plastics (source: European Commission, European Green Deal).

The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) is guided by the principles and objectives outlined in the Farm-to-Fork and Biodiversity 2020 policy. The determinations that may be derived from the analysis of the CAP within the context of the Green New Deal are as follows: This framework should provide support for any activities that align with the objectives of the CAP. Any elements that deviate from the principles of the Green New Deal should not be promoted. Additionally, it is crucial to prioritize the involvement of rural and agricultural workers as the main driving force behind these activities. Within this framework, the European Commission has established a series of objectives for the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). Several aims can be enumerated as follows: The objectives encompassed in the discourse include the attainment of equitable remuneration, the enhancement of competitive dynamics, the mitigation of climate change impacts, the preservation of environmental integrity, the safeguarding of food quality and public health, and the conservation of rural landscapes and biodiversity. Member States are required to demonstrate in their CAP Strategy Plans the ways in which they may make a positive impact on the European Union's environmental and climate sustainability objectives, as well as comply with its energy legislation. The New Deal encompasses the inclusion of support for small and medium-sized farms in the agricultural sector, as well as assistance for young farmers under the framework of the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) and other related programs. The European Union (EU) is employing an incentive structure to actively engage young individuals in the agricultural sector, while simultaneously addressing the issue of unemployment. According to the Farm to Table strategy proposed by the CAP, it is recommended that a legal framework be established by 2023 to support a sustainable food system. Additionally, an emergency action plan for ensuring food supply security should be developed in conjunction with this framework. It is conceivable that by implementing a technologically advanced, streamlined, and contemporary agricultural system, the desired objectives of achieving carbon neutrality and environmentally sustainable growth by 2030 and 2050 may be attainable.

5. Conclusion

The Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) has evolved significantly since its inception in the aftermath of World War II. Initially designed to address food scarcity and economic challenges in Europe, the CAP has undergone multiple reforms to align with changing economic, environmental, and social priorities. The CAP's objectives have expanded beyond ensuring food security to encompass market stability, rural development, and environmental sustainability.

Over the years, the CAP has faced criticism for its budgetary implications and market-distorting effects. Reforms such as the Mansholt Plan, the MacSharry Reform, and the Agenda 2000 Reform aimed at addressing these challenges by introducing measures to improve productivity, reduce surpluses, and align with broader European goals. Direct income support gradually replaced price support, and environmental considerations gained prominence in shaping agricultural policies.

The CAP's latest iteration aligns with the European Green Deal, emphasizing sustainable agriculture, climate action, and biodiversity conservation. The Farm to Fork and Biodiversity Strategies, as part of the Green New Deal, outlines ambitious targets for reducing environmental impact, promoting organic farming, and enhancing food labeling for consumer awareness. The CAP's goals now include equitable remuneration, competitive dynamics, climate change mitigation, food quality, and rural landscapes and biodiversity conservation.

As the CAP moves forward, its success will depend on the effective implementation of the proposed measures, alignment with the Green New Deal principles, and active engagement of agricultural and rural communities. Achieving carbon neutrality and environmentally sustainable growth by 2030 and 2050 requires a collaborative effort involving policymakers, farmers, and other stakeholders. The CAP's journey reflects not just a policy evolution but a commitment to shaping the future of agriculture in a way that is economically viable, socially equitable, and environmentally responsible.
